

Credit card debt reduction service puts more refunds in taxpayers' pockets

By April 15, some taxpayers may get an add-on to their tax refunds. The debt relief candidates being referred to the Debt Free League debt reduction program may be able to keep more money from tax refunds in their pockets by negotiating sizable reductions on credit card balances.

San Diego, CA -- April 10, 2010 – This year, thirty percent of taxpayers intend to spend their tax refunds to pay down debt, according to a study by Princeton Survey Research Associates International. A local accounting firm is taking notice. They are helping tax payers in debt to maximize their refunds by referring them to a debt relief service.

Leiman & Associates endorses the consumer and business debt reduction services offered by Debt Free League with good reason. Ten years ago, $68,000 in corporate credit card debt nearly pushed the company's president, Neil Leiman into bankruptcy. Fortunately, a debt relief service helped him negotiate a settlement of his debt for a mere fraction.

Now, Leiman is spreading the gospel to his clients about the wonders of debt settlement.

Rather than using 100% of a tax refund to pay down debt, the debt settlement solution has allowed some of Leiman's clients to reach agreements with their creditors to pay a portion of their debts as a payment in full.

One of Leiman's recent referrals to Debt

Free League was an out of work truck driver whose wife was also unemployed.

The couple had been helplessly depleting their retirement savings to make ends meet. However, the debt reduction company eased their finances after reaching a settlement on their outstanding $139,000 credit card bill.

Leiman states, "Debt Free League's debt reduction service can get you out of debt in nearly half the time of credit counseling. The bankruptcy alternative helps creditors avoid wasting time and money in court, without any guarantee of ever getting paid."
